From Singapore's Hood George Tan stands in front of the door of his home. 'No-body allowed entry,' he signs - an old Singapore hang-up. But with a knock on the door, a lanky, scruffy youth appears with a scraggly beard. As he walks in, one wonders if he's a Jehovah's Witness. There is something very strange about him. Dressed in baggy black shorts and a tight white T-Shirt, he looks like a college student, except for the pistol at the hip and an AK-47 at the ready. "He was saying something about Armageddon," Tan explains. In the next moment, he disappears. China has become a boom-bust, boom-bust economy. South East Asia remains the main dome for vampire banking, including Singapore. In Singapore, over two decades and over a billion dollars was siphoned out of the banking system from small and medium-sized investment banks through the Asean Interbank Money Transfer Association (AIMTA), and industrial and commercial banks. The banks never recovered and now have been nationalized. The case of Dilbert Tan,
