All of the models work on my Xperia z3.This invention relates to noise reduction of acoustic images and, more particularly, to a system for reducing the noise of an acoustic image by modifying an image with one or more spatially varying filters. Noise is a significant problem in the processing of acoustic images, including the analysis of seismic reflections. For instance, the performance of the detection and quantification of the reflection amplitude associated with a subsurface reflection interface is strongly influenced by the quality of the reflections. An unwanted acoustic noise may adversely affect the acquisition and processing of geophysical data. Among the unwanted noises are the noise generated by the conversion of the reflected energy, the inclusion of surface roughness that is lower than the thickness of the subsurface layer and the effect of surface fluctuations on the acquired data. In a typical acquisition and processing of a seismic reflection, two reflection events are recorded. The first reflection event is the direct reflection, which is caused by a direct reflection from the interface and typically has a positive amplitude. The second reflection event is a reflected or indirect reflection, which is caused by one or more bounces of the acoustic signal off the interface. The reflected portion of
